Alexander James' Underwater Photography

Alexander James is a fine-art photographer who loves to shoot underwater. His latest work was shot in Russia where he lived in an old factory building, sleeping next to a tank filled with 200 tons of water, asking random people in town to become models for his drowning art.

"I create theses sculptural works as a way of remembering, a kind or tragic baroque memory; my process of creating these scenes underwater affords me the ability to interfere with the surface tensions of the water and manipulate light in a totally unique way creating a painterly palette of form and colour. This creation of a single documentary image is all that remains of that event ever having taken place."

All images © Alexander James

Photographer | Photography | Underwater | Underwater Photography | Water

Category: Photography
Date: June 10, 2014
Author: Caroline Kurze

Sign up for our newsletter →

MOST POPULAR

A House In Four Volumes Overlooks The South Pacific Ocean

Price Gyasi Photographs The Colors, Faces And Spirit Of Ghana

Looking Backwards into the Future: The Red Bull Music Academy Revisits Berlin

Adventure Blooms In The Backstreets Of Berlin

The Painterly Underwater Photographs Of Christy Lee Rogers

RELATED

ry Of Trauma And Fear By Marta

Benita Marcussen Portrays Men and their

Be

ska

aphy

Dolls

Photography

Pho

This website uses cookies to ensure you get the best experience. To find out more, read our privacy policy

CLOSE